HALIFAX

NOVA SCOTIA

Most historians concede that Halifax was visited briefly many times before it was founded by Hon. Edward Cornwallis in 1749. Some feel sure that John Cabot saw the harbour as early as 1498, while Portuguese and Spanish ships undoubtedly caught a glimpse of the "Great Harbour" on their early voyages. In 1746 the port was temporarily occupied by the French Armada of D'Anville.

Since it was founded, Halifax has grown from an unpretentious fishing and trading port to one of the world's major ports, with a steadily mounting population of over 100,000. It has developed rapidly in spite of wars and catastrophes and now serves as terminal for leading steamship, air, rail, bus, cable, radio, telegraph and telephone services. Halifax has always been closely connected with the military forces and for many years was the chief military and naval base on this side of the Atlantic. This military bearing is still maintained, although in different ways than when the Citadel was the main defence.

Geographical location makes Halifax the main marketing centre for the Maritime Provinces which now include Newfoundland . . . and the city is nearest the leading overseas markets of the world which accounts for her importance in world trade.

Summer days in Halifax are pleasantly warm and the nights are refreshingly cool. The average maximum and minimum temperatures for the four summer months are 71 and 55 and the relative humidity 68%.
